 CPU core speed vs Computer Performance

- Why the overall CPU frequency approach is changing ?
  - Consistent frequency growth in the past decade
    - from hundreds of MHz to GHz
  - CPU frequency has reduced in the past couple of years
- Designing chips for better performance
  - Limits are imposed by physics, technology or economics
  - Controls the rate of improvements in different dimensions
  - Different processor architectures have different issues with overlocking
- Physical limitations
  - Speed of light limits how fast signals travel from one end to the other on a chip
  - Power and heat dissipation
  - Cooling
  - How many memory elements (caches) can be within a given latency from the CPU
- Physical limitations force the designers to make trade-offs
  - "Shrinking" a processor chip
    - pro: Faster due to the shorter distances
    - con: Reduced area for dissipation
      - Power dissipation increases as the chip speeds up
  - Raising the processor voltages would make transistors to switch quicker
    - pro: Frequency could then be increased
    - con: current also increases creating more heat
      - Sounds easy... but... it causes serious problems with heat
- Emerging technologies allow frequency variation according to processing needs

 CPU Clock speed versus Computer Performance..

- GHz is not the only dimension that matters
  - System z focus is on balanced system design across many factors:
    - Frequency, pipeline, efficiency, energy efficiency, cache/memory design and I/O design
    - Greater logic density, power density, wire-ability. All permits more cores per chip, larger cache, additional execution units/circuits, addition of SMT and SIMD on each core.
- System performance is not linear with frequency
  - Need to use LSPR and System z capacity planning tools for real client / workload sizing
- System z leverages technologies to get the most out of chips design
  - Low latency pipelines
  - Dense packaging with proper cooling which yields more power-efficient operation
  - Consistent performance at high utilization
- The IBM z13 Server is a significant change from zEC12
  - Processor speed measured in instructions per second (for a given workload) has increased as compared to the zEC12.
    - Wider pipeline (up to six per cycle)
    - Enhanced branch prediction
    - Optimized resolution of dependencies between instructions.
